Daphne Odjig's iconic Thunderbird Woman was recreated by Mike Valcourt and Peatr Thomas for the Wall-to-Wall Mural and Cultural Festival.

Thunderbird Woman soars in mural form

THE University of Winnipeg's downtown Duckworth Centre is the canvas for a massive mural of Daphne Odjig's iconic Thunderbird Woman.

The work of art was reproduced over the course of 56 days this fall by artists Mike Valcourt and Peatr Thomas for the Wall-to-Wall Mural and Cultural Festival. Thunderbird Woman was the final piece to be painted in the two-month-long event. The mural measures nearly 10 metres by eight metres.

"The Thunderbird Woman represents a figure of transformation, half-woman and half-bird. It is an icon, a symbolic message of hope and matriarchal strength," said Jaimie Issac, curator of Indigenous and contemporary art at the Winnipeg Art Gallery. Issac guest curated the project with festival curators Synonym Art Consultation.

Odjig created Thunderbird Woman in 1973, when she lived in Winnipeg. A founder of the Aboriginal Group of Seven, Odjig opened the first Indigenous-run gallery in Canada: the New Warehouse Gallery. It became the home for the Aboriginal Group of Seven.

Odjig, who died in 2016 at age 97, remains a celebrated Indigenous artist.

Collectors and gallery curators alike consider her work as relevant today as ever, and often cite her as an example of the current resurgence of Indigenous artistic expression.

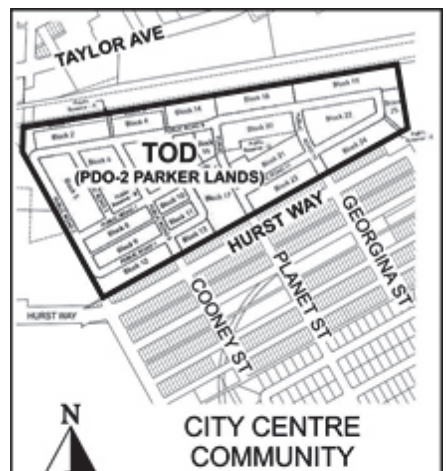

In a statement, festival artists and organizers said they hoped the recreation would deepen public appreciation of Indigenous art. They said they want it to act as a symbol of strength as Winnipeg continues to evolve and face challenges posed by issues of social justice related to Indigenous Peoples.
